FYI

It is estimated that more than half of all food consumed in North America is consumed outside the home. This change in eating habits has led to increased sales of plastic, disposable dinnerware. Manufacturers have been busy trying to keep up with the still growing demand.

Plastic dinnerware is produced by a process called injection molding. In this process, plastic is heated to a liquid state and then injected into a mold. Injection molding is widely used for manufacturing cutlery, bowls, cups and plates. Over the past decade, the injection foodservice business has increased each year.

How to choose dinnerware

1. Should I use paper dinnerware?

Uncoated paper dinnerware is the most economical option. The paper can be coated to increase the strength and rigidity of paper and make it grease resistant; however, coated paper dinnerware can cost almost twice as much as uncoated paper. Paper dinnerware is thinner and thus requires less storage space than plastic or foam dinnerware.

2. Should I use foam dinnerware?

Foam dinnerware is lighter than china, yet is strong enough to hold a full portion without bending. Foam has superior insulating qualities: it keeps hot foods hot and cold foods cold. Lamination increases the strength, durability and cut resistance. Unlaminated foam is a good value for users not requiring heavyweight dinnerware. The finest quality foam dinnerware has a finish that recreates the look and feel of fine china and is cut resistant, tough and nonabsorbent.

3. Should I use plastic dinnerware?

Plastic, with its glossy finish, has a more upscale look, and is ideal for menu items requiring an elegant presentation. Plastic is strong enough to hold up through the entire meal and is soak-proof and cut resistant. High-impact polystyrene is the strongest disposable plastic dinnerware. Plastic dinnerware is the most costly option.
